

TALKING POINTS:

- We're here today to discuss Mondelēz International's voluntary product recall of its Nilla Wafers cookies.
- We're thinking of the Pulver family during this time, and as a mother and CEO, I want to extend get-well wishes on behalf of all of us at Mondelēz International.
- Despite the awful allergic reaction of Nicholas Pulver, Mondelēz International is not to blame for this incident.
- We truly take pride in the company we've built the past 35 years in manufacturing Nilla Wafers and more than 25 additional products.
- Our Nilla Wafers recipe was altered in order to replace other unhealthy ingredients and cut production costs.
- The production of Nilla Wafers will continue manufacturing next month using the new recipe and will be distributed to all our retailers.
- It's important to point out that there's such a small amount of peanuts in our new recipe that the law doesn't require the amount to be printed on the ingredients label.
- I'd also like to point out that Nicholas Pulver has been the only case regarding any illnesses involving Nilla Wafers's recipe change.
- It's up to the product retailers whether to issue the voluntary recall of Nilla Wafers or not, but we'd like to assure all of our customers that no other Mondelēz products have been affected by this recall.
